General Muster Of New South Wales 1814.

The first muster or systematic check of the population was taken in February 1788, shortly after the arrival of the First Fleet in New South Wales. From 1795, musters appear to have been held annually, and were usually supervised by Governor or Lieutenant-Governor and an officer of the Commissary. Musters were the means by which the government counted the population and controlled the convicts. Musters also noted whether individuals were victualled from the government stores or were self-supporting, thereby assisting officials to determine the colony's ability to support itself without recourse to the public stores. These documents shed light on the early social history of the colony, at the time when few records exist for ordinary people. Click here to Order

Darwin, NT: Australian National University North Australian Research Unit; 1992. In the 1930s Australia was stunned by a series of seemingly inexplicable murders of non-Aboriginal people perpetrated by the Arnhem Land Yolngu. After eight deaths in two years, newspapers were calling it the 'Black War'. Missionaries, police and the media were equally convinced they knew the reasons for the killings. Following the arrest and trials of the alleged killers, non-Aboriginal Australia was forced to debate the issue of their occupation of the continent. In the process, issues of Aboriginal rights to justice and defence of their land were raised. Click here to Order

The University of Chicago Press; 1996.

The author conceives of culture as an open-ended, continually developing sequences of events. "The conceptual basis of a culture can never be summed up as a logical ordering, or a closed system, of internally consistent propositions." metaphoric innovation is inevitable. The Author observations on the Daribi provide a compelling demonstration of this theory, one that places him at the forefront of the rapidly growing field of symbolic anthropology.
